Using multimedia for your revision

MULTIMEDIA & REVISION

There are lots of different apps and websites which exist nowadays to help you with your revision. They are engaging, available 'on the go', are typically free and remove the need to carry around textbooks and folders. They can help with:

- taking notes
- organising your notes
- memorising
- understanding topics
- organising your time

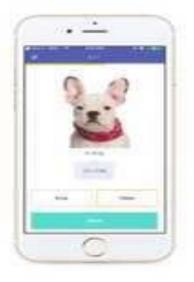

Simplemind allows you to create digital mindmaps in incredible detail with the option to add colours, labels, images etc.

Quizlet allows you to create flash cards online and test yourself / play games or you can use flashcards created by other people by searching for a topic

Memrise allows you to create key word/fact lists online and test yourself or you can use sets created by other people – there is a competitive leader board

Originally created for learning languages, the app now covers a range of subjects including science, maths, politics etc.

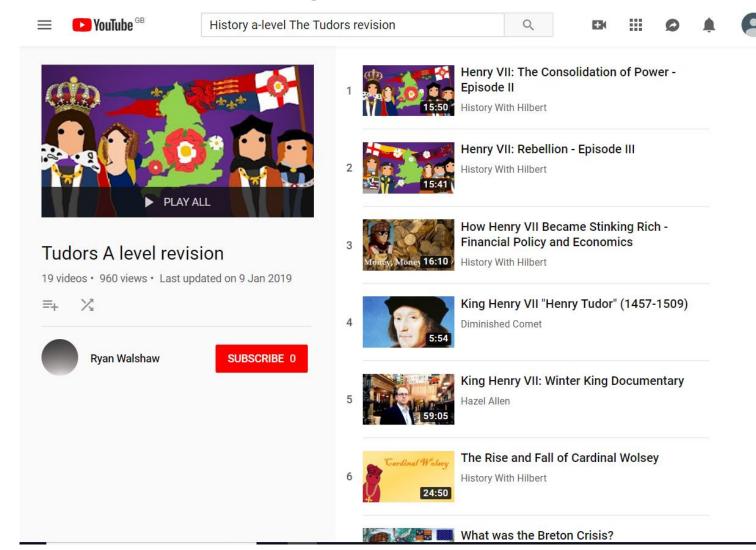

TED and TEDx talks cover a range of topics including how the brain works, what the political climate looks like in the USA, what the Quran says about the Hijab

YouTube has a wealth of revision videos based on specific topics from A-level specifications – a quick search for 'History a-level The Tudors revision' revealed the following:

Podcasts are an excellent way to revise on-the-go and, like YouTube, can be found for most a-level subjects and content. The website below is great for finding podcasts on the topics you are interested in:

Now use the remaining time to have a look at the apps and websites we have discussed today – try one of them and see if you think it could benefit you and your revision. Here's a reminder of them all:
